

Day of Mourning honours workers who lost their lives on the job

Every year on April 28, we honour the memory of Canadian workers who have lost their lives due to work-related injuries or occupational diseases. The annual Day of Mourning is an opportunity to remember those fallen workers and to re-commit to creating safer workplaces.

In B.C., an average of

- Three workers die each week
- More than 3,000 work injuries are reported every week
- 19 workers are permanently disabled every working day

Safety is everyone's responsibility. It takes real commitment and dedication to make sure we all go home safe at the end of the day.

The next time you see an unsafe situation—whether it's an unsecured ladder, a missing guardrail, or an unguarded opening—don't ignore it or consider it someone else's problem. Report any hazards to your supervisor or employer.

Follow established safe work procedures, and make sure your ability to work safely is not affected by alcohol and other drugs.

No one should have to end up as a statistic at next year's Day of Mourning.
